Get kids moving with media? This is how you do it!

Have your child take three giant steps away from the screen. This is much better for their eyes! Sitting away from a TV is easier than protecting your eyes from mobile and computer screens.

Read a book while sitting, play a game on the floor, or dance along to a YouTube video. And, after 20 minutes, devise a fun 'distance gazing' game. For example: can you spot the birds in the tree? Or: which colours do those cars have?

Have your child roll up and stretch out fully after watching a video or playing a game. Investigate together what it feels like to make yourself very small AND very tall. Put on some fun music and see which movements this inspires.

Use something you read in a book as inspiration to create a play. Draw the main characters or create puppets. Do a stop dance to the intro music of a video. That way, you alternate between activities and associate media with movement.

Not sitting still for long periods of time is just as important as getting enough exercise. Don't leave your child in a child seat, pushchair or car seat for more than an hour.

With these ten tips you can strike the right balance between sitting still and being active quickly and easily, with AND without media.

- Encourage your child to keep a good distance from the screen
- 2. Change positions

Alternate!

- Participate in what you read, see or hear
- 5. Discover movements
 - Be active

Associate media with other activities

8. Head outdoors together

Don't sit still for too long

10. Set a good example -

An active position makes all the difference. Sitting on the floor is a more active position than slouching on the couch. A stool is even more active. Using media while standing, however, is the best option!

When using media, you can easily move along with the stories, for example by reading books and listening to podcasts. Use expressions and your hands and feet to act out what's going on screen and make fun and suspenseful noises.

Children need a lot of movement from a very young age. Is your child aged 3 or older? The recommendation is at least one hour of (moderate to intensive) exercise in that case. Climbing, running or cycling are all good activities. But so is going to the shops together, vacuuming the stairs or cleaning the windows.

Get out, regardless of the weather. Go on a treasure hunt around your neighbourhood, devise a photo assignment, or try to find out (online) which animals and plants you can spot near you.

If you as a parent tend to use media while sitting, your child will copy what you do. Make sure to alternate between times with and without media, and between exercise, sitting, and standing. And discuss this with your child. Ask your child what he/she thinks of your media use.

The following partners of Netwerk Mediawijsheid contributed to these ten tips: Kenniscentrum Sport & Bewegen, Mediasmarties, Nji, Trimbos-instituut, Lagendijk Empowering, Kennisnet, JOGG, Humankind, gro-up, and Windesheim.